MERIT, DIVERSITY, SOCIAL JUSTICE

The Covid crisis has not only made the world more unequal, but, above all, it has created new types of inequality. These have overlapped with existing ones, generating marked income gaps within even relatively small businesses and communities. To income gaps we must add often overlapping gaps in health and housing conditions (both of which are increasingly important in determining one's success in the labor market). These are inequalities that often have very little to do with individual merit and are linked to different starting conditions or to chance. For example, business owners active in e-commerce have greatly benefited from the closure of many businesses, a circumstance that was largely unforeseeable before the pandemic.

To what extent can the end of the pandemic reabsorb these inequalities, or at least tie them more closely to individual merit rather than chance? How can we prevent current inflationary pressures and the large influx of refugees linked to the war in Ukraine from exacerbating social and distributional tensions? And can the recognition that behind inequalities there are also different levels of commitment and different individual performances reduce the sense of injustice many losers feel towards such unequal societies?

A central problem is how to measure merit. Many decisions taken on a daily basis, though generating large and persistent income inequalities, are based on selection processes whose aim is to reward merit. Based on information regarding the motivations and achievements of those who apply, decisions are made on who to hire, what salaries to offer, who to admit to the best universities and who to award training opportunities to. Rules of this kind are intended to give an incentive to everyone, even those who won't be rewarded, to try their best in what they do. But is it really merit that is being assessed in these selections? How much of what we actually measure is related to the commitment of individuals and how much to innate abilities, favourable starting conditions and chance? Is there not a risk, by rewarding merit, of excluding a priori an important section of our societies, offering no hope to those who did not possess these qualities and opportunities to begin with? Is there not a danger of widening inequalities and obstructing social mobility, instead of levelling out opportunities, by trying to offer as much equality of opportunity as possible? Can the recognition of merit extend to include non-cognitive abilities within everyone's reach such as empathy, social capital and the perception of externalities associated with one's daily actions? And how much merit is individual rather than the product of a collective?

Discrimination clearly remains an important element of many inequalities. But it is perhaps even more difficult to identify and measure discrimination than merit. In an increasing number of cases, even merit-based selection processes include places reserved for historically under-represented groups and minorities. There may be, for example, gender and ethnic quotas in university admissions, as in the selection of board members. These forms of positive discrimination can also serve to overcome prejudices and more or less explicit resistance to treating different people equally for factors that have nothing to do with individual commitment. But it is very difficult to establish at what level these restrictions should be placed and for how long they should be maintained.

Tito Boeri
Director

The International Festival of Economics (IFE), conceived, designed and organized by Editori Laterza, the Editorial Committee and the Director Professor Tito Boeri, is realized in collaboration with the TOLC (Turin Local Committee) and coordinated by the Collegio Carlo Alberto Foundation.

In addition to the Collegio Carlo Alberto Foundation, an institute for research and advanced training in economic and social sciences, the TOLC is composed of the Region of Piedmont and the City of Turin, the Compagnia di San Paolo Foundation, the CRT Foundation, the University of Turin, the Polytechnic University of Turin, the Turin Chamber of Commerce, the Unioncamere Piemonte and the Unione Industriali Torino.

All the institutions that have joined the Turin Local Committee share the ultimate goal of protecting the common good, supporting the development of the area and improving the community in order to build a future of growth based on solid and shared foundations, networking with other local, national and international players.

In supporting the International Festival of Economics, the promoters and funders represented in the TOLC have identified its alignment with their mission and strategy, thanks to the solid framework of scientific dissemination, the great ability to involve the community on crucial issues to understand the present and build the future, as well as the promotion of an important international network, with the participation of prominent speakers, academics, economic policy actors, representatives of institutions and businesses.

SCHOOL AND THE PANDEMIC

Introduced by MARIA LAURA DI TOMMASO
Moderator FRANCESCA DI LIBERTI

In response to COVID-19, schools closed in many countries, potentially exacerbating learning gaps. We evaluate the effectiveness of an intervention implemented in Italian middle schools that provides free individual tutoring online to disadvantaged students. Tutors are university students who volunteer for 3 to 6 hours per week. They are randomly assigned to middle school students, from a list of potential beneficiaries compiled by school principals. Using original survey data from students, parents, teachers and tutors, we find that the program substantially increased students' academic performance and significantly improved their socio-emotional skills, aspirations and psychological well-being.

Measuring the loss of skills due to this long pandemic period is a fundamental step for the definition of interventions in schools and policies aimed at mitigating its consequences. In most countries, including Italy, a net loss in student learning is estimated. It is also evident that, as feared, those from disadvantaged families and younger children suffer the most. It is therefore important to quantify the impact of the pandemic on education in our country too, with a particular focus on the most fragile individuals.

Emerging from the Covid-19 pandemic, the European economy is facing a new shock. The war in Ukraine, far from being a localized event, is developing as a major geopolitical transformation, with widespread economic consequences. Uncertainty, the protracted energy shock, concerns for energy and food security, pressures for de-globalisation, all add to concerns about the resilience of the EU recovery to policy normalisation and the increasing risks of divergence. The panel will tackle all these issues, bringing together the perspective of chief economists and academics from various institutions.

DE-GLOBALIZATION? GLOBAL VALUE CHAINS AND THE GLOBAL ECONOMIC TURMOIL

Introduced by FRANCESCO PROFUMO, THIERRY VERDIER

In this lecture, I will evaluate the extent to which the world economy has entered a phase of de-globalisation, and I will offer some speculative thoughts on the future of global value chains. Although the growth of international trade flows relative to that of GDP has slowed down since the Great Recession, I have found little systematic evidence indicating that the world economy has already entered an era of de-globalisation. Instead, the observed slowdown in globalization is a natural sequel to the unsustainable increase in globalization experienced in the late 1980s, 1990s and early 2000s. I will offer a description of the mechanisms leading to that earlier expansionary phase, together with a discussion of why these forces might have run out of steam, and the extent to which they may be reversible. I will conclude that the main challenge for the future of globalisation is institutional and political in nature rather than technological, although new technologies might aggravate the trends in inequality that have created the current political backlash against globalisation. Zooming in on current events, I will similarly conclude that the future of globalisation may be darker if geopolitical tensions continue to rise, especially in light of the recent Russian invasion of Ukraine.

DIVERSITY, PLURALISM AND TOLERANCE: THE ROOTS OF ECONOMIC PROGRESS?

Diversity of what? One could focus on ethnic or racial diversity, or one could look at different diversities: genetic, cultural, religious, linguistic, and so on. Each of these has its specificity and it is hard to draw general conclusions about their impact on economic progress. The same does not hold for pluralism and tolerance. Economic history and economic analysis indicate that pluralism and tolerance ("live and let live") support economic progress.

Welfare programs have provided a temporary

Moderator EVELINA CHRISTILLIN

In areas of high youth unemployment kids must be kept off the streets. Instead of big infrastructure projects and big events that last a fortnight and leave gigantic facilities unusable, it is better to build soccer, basketball, volleyball fields and swimming pools. Then you need the commitment to maintain them, so that they do not become places of decay. This also creates jobs, and has a widespread effect on society. In redesigning the NRRP, it is good to set these goals. Perhaps it is in those very pools that tomorrow's champions will grow.

THE IDEA OF JUSTICE

Introduced by DOMENICO MANGIAFAVE

After World War II, economic growth was combined with better income distribution and less social, cultural and gender discrimination.

During this period, Western theories of justice closely connected freedom and welfare. Today, with the growth of inequality, democracy also appears to be in trouble, with nationalism resurging and the specter of war returning to Europe. It follows that the prevailing ideas in political theory have changed greatly.

WHY POVERTY? A SHORT HISTORY OF IDEAS

Introduced by MARCO SANFILIPPO

Also in streaming

This lecture discusses how beliefs in the efficiency of markets shapes our view of poverty and the link between poverty and growth. At one extreme, if markets allocate labor efficiently poverty can only be due to immutable traits and growth is essential to fund the consumption of the poor. At the other, unequal access to opportunities for women, ethnic minorities and low socio-economic status individuals all interfere with the allocation of people to jobs and ultimately national income. If so, growth is an externality from poverty reduction as it is possible to make societies more productive and more equitable at the same time.

CULTURE AND INSTITUTIONS: A NEW APPROACH

Introduced by GIORGIO BARBA NAVARETTI

This talk will advocate a new approach to the interplay between culture and institutions, which shape the nature of most societies and their economies. Instead of dwelling on the primacy of either culture or institutions, the new framework develops how cultural configurations shape political outcomes, but at the same time culture is fluid and changes in response to political and economic factors. The framework clarifies conditions under which cultures are more fluid and can respond to changing circumstances, as well as reasons why fluid cultures have both costs and benefits. These ideas are illustrated from various historical and contemporary cases.

Music is dangerous - Concertato is a musical tale, narrated by the instruments acting on stage - piano, double bass, percussion, saxophone, clarinet, guitar, cello, accordion. Scanning the stations of this musical journey in complete freedom, Nicola Piovani tells the audience the meaning of these jagged paths that have led him to flank the work of De André, Fellini, Magni, Spanish, French, and Dutch directors, for theater, film, television, and instrumental singers, alternating between the performance of theatrically unreleased pieces and new versions of better-known pieces, rearranged for the occasion. In this theatrical storytelling, the word reaches where the music cannot go, but, more importantly, the music takes over where the word does not and cannot travel. On-stage videos supplement the narrative with images from films, performances and, above all, images that artists such as Milo Manara have dedicated to Piovani's musical work.
